The thing you are hoping to do

IN every business that is destined to grow, one man at least is engaged on a stupendous task. He is trying to give people a better understanding of the product he is marketing. He is hoping to get his salesmen, his partners, his dealers, and the public to appreciate the actual, human, social need of the service his product is made to render.

He has studied his product. He has studied its present use and its possible uses. He has worked and spent to improve it.

And yet, instead of seeing and selling or buying this product in terms of the service it renders, everyone goes ahead and buys or sells in terms of so much material at such and such a price.

If you are wrestling with the job of making your product better understood and more advantageously used, it is because you know it can be done, you know it will be done, and you don't want to struggle twenty years only to see someone else take up your idea and win with it, while you and your efforts are forgotten.

Advertising does in a few years the things that otherwise would require a generation to accomplish.

Most of the great advertising successes are those which have given the public a new conception of the way to buy and use an old product.

If advertising can help you do the thing you are trying to do, you need it and want it. If a talk with men who understand how advertising works would help you, call on us.

ONCE a month, or more frequently, we issue a publication called Batten's Wedge. Each issue is devoted to a single editorial on some phase of business. If you are a business executive and would like to receive copies, write us.
